(AP Photo/Matt Slocum, File) PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Philadelphia Phillies' Christian Walker is marking his transition from professional baseball player to citizen with hope, pride and a few tears. Walker, a 25-year-old Philadelphia Phillies who has spent the past two seasons in the minor leagues, is marking the first step toward citizenship at the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services offices in the city's Logan Square neighborhood. His hearing is July 10 and it's uncertain when he can get an answer on his citizenship petition, a process that could take six or more years to complete if all goes well. "I can't wait to finally have a U.S. passport so I can use it for the rest of my life and just travel," Walker said. Sitting on a bench near the statue of William Penn at the center of the square, an expectant Walker and his fiancée and teammate Nick Williams, both 25, said that's why Walker is sharing his story and others like it. "Getting a U.S. passport has never been this close, and he's the first person we know to do it," Williams said. Williams and Walker, both Philadelphia Phillies minor league players, are staying at the Marriott at the Convention Center this week. The team has been coming in for WIP radio show visits and will play the New York Mets tonight. "It feels good. It's been a long process, a couple of years of building it up and working on my citizenship," Walker said. Walker will be at home Thursday because he
